THE KREUTZER SONATA.

The Duet of Beethoven Whose Name Is the Title of Tolstoi's Book.

The title of Count Tolstoi's last novel, admirably suggestive to musicians and to the great majority of even moderately cultivated amateurs of music, seems, says the Speaker, to have puzzled many of the Russian author's commentators and translators. The Kreutzer Sonata is the most beautiful, as well as the most popular, of Beethoven's many beautiful duets for violin and piano; and the two evenly balanced and constantly responsive parts, full of tender and passionate phrases, cannot but give the idea of a love duet. No one but Beethoven could have written it, and, as a matter of fact, Beethoven did write it. Yet the French papers appear to think it was composed by Kreutzer and boldly call it "La Sonate de Kreutzer," whereas it was only dedicated to Kreutzer, the principal violinist of Marie Antoinette's concert orchestra. The name of Kreutzer ought to be known to the French, though Berlioz has told us his countrymen never could master either its orthography or its pronunciation. They now attribute to Kreutzer one of the most characteristic and most fascinating of Beethoven's works. The writer of the interesting account of Count Tolstoi's book published in the Universal Review makes the performer of the string part play it on the violincello. If this prodigious mistake occurs in the novel (a supposition scarcely tenable), Count Tolstoi's eloquent rhapsodies as to the dangerously seductive character of the work lose a good deal of the value which might otherwise belong to them.

That Beethoven was passionately in love when he wrote the Kreutzer Sonata is evident, not only from the thrilling melodies of the work itself, but also from positive external testimony. He dedicated the sonata in the first instance to a violinist named Bridgetower, well known in London and Bridgetower; played the violin part so beautifully that Beethoven, hearing it for the first time, embraced his friend (as the French say) "with effusion." Soon after the composer found that his favorite violinist was making love to the very woman whom he at that moment cared for above all others. He then suppressed the original dedication, and inscribed the sonata to Kreutzer, who, but for this accident, would now scarcely be known. There is yet another to be written on the subject of the Kreutzer Sonata.

Even Older Than the Boy Preacher.

[From the New York Tribune.]

Probably the oldest train boy in the world is in active service on the Derby railroad, between New Haven and Birmingham, Connecticut. His name is Henry Warren, and he is in his eighty-second year.
